Pak-IMF conclude talks with key commitments

F.P. Report

ISLAMABAD: The fiveday negotiations between Pakistan and the IMF have concluded, with Pakistan successfully convincing the IMF of the provincial budget surplus. On the final day, the IMF mission held discussions with the federal finance minister, provincial governments, and the FBR.

Pakistan achieved partial success on agricultural tax, and the government assured the IMF of securing external financing. The IMF mission is expected to return to Pakistan for the first economic review under the loan program in February or March.

In addition, Finance

Muhammad Minister Aurangzeb met the IMF delegation for a farewell discussion, reaffirming Pakistan's commitment to strict adherence to the loan programme. The government also committed to reforms in the tax and enersectors, alongside addressing external financing gaps. They stressed the need for faster legislation on agricultural income tax and super tax, similar to Punjab's efforts.

Sources revealed that Pakistan has the potential to generate Rs2,300 billion in tax revenue from agriculture and livestock, but collection remains minimal. The Finance Ministry presented revised figures, showing a surplus of Rs360 billion in provincial budgets, exceeding the IMF target of Rs342 billion for the first quarter. The FBR chairman and members briefed the IMF mission on the strategy to meet the annual tax target of Rs12.97 trillion and formalise the economy, including a plan to monitor factory production through a software tool called "Digital Eye.'

Canopy Trees: A vital resource in combating smog, air pollution

PESHAWAR (APP): In an ongoing battle against air pollution, especially smog, the preservation and plantation of canopy trees in big cities were stressed by environmenalists and forestry experts to win the fight against these environmental challenges.

Declaring PM 2.5 pollution is dangerous for human and living creatures, the experts arged the KP Govt, city planners and local authorities to focus on these trees to mitigate the adverse effects of air pollution, which has been on the rise in many urban centers, particularly in Peshawar.

Gulzar Rehman, former Conservator of Forests KP told APP that the cutting of conopy trees for housing societies, expansion of roads and monetary benefits have contributed to air pollution in Peshawar.

He said that Pakistan was a home to more than 200 native tree species and nine distinct forest ecological systems, many of which are found nowhere else in the world.

Among these, canopy trees like Siris, Pipal, Bakin, and Shisham are particularly vital for improving air quality in cities. He emphasized that these trees are not only an aesthetic asset to urban landscapes but also play a significant role in air purification and environmental balance. "A single healthy canopy tree can provide oxygen for up to four people," Gulzar stated. "Furthermore, 1,075 trees planted on just one hectare of land can absorb six to eight tons of carbon dioxide every day.

However, he lamented that the unchecked cutting of these trees in urban areas, especially in Peshawar in the past, has exacerbated the city's growing pollution problems, contributing directly to the smog and air pollution that could be seen even with a naked eye while standing on Surey bridge. Peshawar, once known for its lush green landscapes and rich biodiversity, has seen a dramatic decline in its tree cover over the past few decades. Historically, the Peshawar Valley was home to a dense forest ecosystem, which not only helped purify the air but also acted as a natural water source and a habitat for wildlife. This biodiversity was instrumental in maintaining the ecological balance of the region. A historical account from the Tuzk-e-Babari, the memoir of the first Mughal emperor Zaheer-ud-Din Babar, described the presence of thick forests surrounding Peshawar, which were so dense that they supported a wide range of wildlife, including lions.

Babar's hunting expeditions in the region strongly reflected the once-rich forests that contributed to the area's environmental health and resilience. However, with the rapid urbanization and industrialization of Peshawar and other major cities, much of this natural greenery has been lost, exposing its residents to pollution hazards.

Muhammad Irshad, Chief Analyst, Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) KP told APP that canopy trees were a great source of controlling dangerous PM 2.5 level pollution. "PM 2.5 is a complex mixture of extremely small and light particles staying for a longer period in air and once inhaled, can affect peoples' hearts, nose to lungs, respiratory system besides leading to high blood pressure, strokes, asthma, cancer and other chronic diseases. He said that NEQS 'recommended level of tiny particles in air should not be more than 15mg per cubic meter.

Irshad said EPA had conducted a scientific study in Peshawar and recorded 52mg/m3 higher dust and smoke particulate in air which normally should be 15mg/m3 as per NEQS standards. "The smoke and dust in air was measured between five to 10 feet higher in different places where PM2.5 is almost four times higher than NEQS limits,' he said adding, canopy trees with 10 feet or more height have the ability to absorb such high level of carbon dioxide and pollutant gases in Peshawar. Dr Mumtaz Malik, former Chief Conservator Wildlife KP said a large number of rees are planted during spring and monsoon afforestation campaigns every year in KP out many disappear with a passage of time because of wrong selection of saplings for different climate zones, ill-planning and improper care.

He said that today even birds like Cranes and Houbara Bustard can hardly be seen in he Peshawar's outskirts for which once it was famous, in addition to substantial decrease of aquatic species including Mahsher and Trout in rivers Swat and Kabul due to rising temperatures and water pollution.

In-spite of unsuccessful experiences of plantation of Dates (Kajoor) trees on Quaide-Azam Highway at Blue Area Islamabad in the past, he regretted that the same mistake was repeated on Islamabad-Peshawar Motorway where dates' plants were planted in substantial quantity contrary to the area's climate conditions, resultantly many either died pre-maturely or their overall growth were affected.

Despite numerous qualities of cost efficient native trees, he said, preference was still being given to eucalyptus and fashionable small-sized bushy plants which scarcely have the power to fight pollutant gases.

Spain flood epicentre survives fresh rain alert

MADRID (AFP): Spain's traumatised Valencia region emerged unscathed from an urgent rain alert on Thursday, two weeks after the country's deadliest floods in decades killed more than 200 people there. National weather agency AEMET downgraded the highest red warning for rain by two levels for the eastern Valencia coast after a new storm made landfall without causing victims.

Regional authorities in Valencia scrapped the closure of universities, schools, adult daycare centres and sports facilities as well as travel restrictions for private vehicles announced. The high-speed rail line between Madrid and Valencia restarted for the first time since being suspended by the floods, Interior Minister Fernando Grande-Marlaska told reporters.

AEMET issued an orange warning for rain for swathes of the southern Andalusia region where schools and universities remained shut for more than 500,000 pupils on Thursday. The latest storm has sparked the evacua-tion of around 4,000 residents in Andalusia, its leader Juanma Moreno said, adding their return on Thursday would be "very difficult".

The October 29 disaster killed 224 people -- almost all in the Valencia region -- as well as destroying homes, businesses and infrastructure. The swift evacuations in and around the southern city of Malaga "likely saved many lives", said Jess Neumann, a in Malaga appears to be improving Thursday morning after dozens of flights were delayed and 15 cancelled following a powerful storm over the popular tourist destination Costa del Sol in Spain.

Thousands of residents have been evacuated along the Guadalhorce River west of Malaga and reportedly along the Vélez River due to a high risk of flooding, while the city's main hospital is now limiting its services to only emergencies after they were flooded.

The UK's Foreign Office (FCDO) has updated its travel advice to warn that severe weather and flooding is affecting many areas along the Mediterranean coastline of Spain. Most of the scheduled departures flying out from Malaga are also undisrupted, apart from two flights, one to Paris and another to Valencia, that have been cancelled. Trump's pledge to axe Dept of Education explained

International

WASHINGTON (BBC): One of the key promises Trump made while campaigning for the White House was to abolish the US Department of Education. The federal agency, established in 1979, oversees funding for public schools, administers student loans and runs programmes to help lowincome students.

Trump has accused the agency of "indoctrinating young people with inappropriate racial, sexual, and political material". But in order to scrap the department, the incoming Republican president would need congressional approval - an uphill battle. On his own, no. Not only would Trump need congressional approval, but he would also probably need a supermajority - 60 out of 100 senators. While Republicans have a majority in the Senate, they do not have 60 members in the upper chamber, so they would need a few Democrats to vote to abolish the agency. There's zero chance of that. Even in the House of Representatives, Trump would struggle to gain necessary support.

A vote last year to abolish the education department - which was attached as an amendment to another bill - failed to pass as 60 Republicans joined all Democrats in the House to vote no. So Trump's pledge could turn out to be largely symbolic. The Department of Education oversees student loan programmes and administers Pell grants that help low-income students attend university. The department also helps fund programmes to support students with disabilities and for students living in poverty. And it enforces civil rights law that prevents race or sex-based discrimination in federally funded schools. The department's allocation was $238bn (£188bn) in fiscal year 2024 - under 2% of the total federal budget.

The idea has been floated by Republicans for decades. During Ronald Reagan's 1980 presidential campaign, he pushed for it to be dismantled. Republicans have accused the education department of pushing what they describe as "woke" political ideology on to children, including on gender and race. They want the agency's authority handed to the US states, which run most education matters. Conservatives also argue that other education department functions, such as administering loans, should be handled instead by the Department Treasury, and that civil rights infractions are the Department of Justice's domain. Trump's allies also want to expand school choice, which would allow students and families to select alternatives to public direct result of the violence, it said, noting that the leading cause of death across the Sudan was preventable disease and starvation. Many more people have died elsewhere in the country, especially in the western region of Darfur, where there have been numerous reports of atrocities and ethnic cleansing.

Aid workers say the 19-month conflict non-Arabic population. in Sudan has created the world's worst humanitarian crisis, with many thousands at risk of famine. Until now, the UN and other aid agencies have been using the figure of 20,000 confirmed deaths. Because of the fighting and chaos in the country, there has been no systematic recording of the number of people killed. In May, US special envoy for Sudan Tom Perriello said that some estimates suggested up to 150,000 people had been killed. The Sudan Research Group study comes as Amnesty International said French military technology was being used in the conflict, in violation of a UN arms embargo. On Thursday, the rights group said the Rapid Support Forces (RSF) militia, which is batdling the army, was using vehicles in Darfur supplied by the United Arab Emirates (UAE) that are fitted with French hardware. "Our research shows that weaponry designed and manufactured in France is in active use on the battlefield in Sudan," said Amnesty's Secretary General Agnès

Callamard. The BBC has asked for comment from France and the UAE, which has previously denied arming the RSF. The Galix defence system - made in France by companies KNDS and Lacroix - is used for land forces to help counter close-range attacks. Amnesty said the weapons could be used to commit or facilitate serious rights violations, adding that the French government must ensure the companies "immediately stop the supply of this system to the UAE". The rights group shared images, which it said it had verified, of destroyed nership in the defence sector and cited a try or determine how many deaths in all parliamentary report indicating that French could be linked to the war.

The UN first imposed an arms embargo in Darfur in 2004, following allegations of ethnic cleansing against the region's > Amnesty has called for the embargo to be expanded to the rest of Sudan, and to strengthen its monitoring mechanism fol-lowing the outbreak of the civil war. Amnesty has urged all countries to stop directly and indirectly supplying arms to Sudan's fighting factions. The paramilitary RSF, led by general Mohamed Hamdan Daglo, has been at war with Sudan's regular army under Abdel Fattah al-Burhan since April 2023 when the two former allies took up arms against each other in a ferocious power struggle.

> The RSF has been accused of ethnic cleansing in Darfur, which it has denied, blaming local militias. Both parties have been accused of committing war crimes, with the ongoing fighting leaving thousands dead and millions displaced. In August, a UN-backed committee of experts declared famine conditions in parts of Darfur. The head of the UN World Health Organization (WHO) said starvation was "almost everywhere" following a visit to the country a month later. "The situation in Sudan is very alarming... the massive displacement - it's now the largest in the world, and, of course, famine," director-general Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus then told the BBC.

The confluence of war, hunger, displacement and disease in Sudan has however been overshadowed internationally by the wars in Ukraine and the Middle East. The Sudan Research Group research found that 90% of the deaths in Khartoum were unrecorded, pointing to a potentially similar situation in other regions. However, vehicles on the ground that had the Galix Mayson Dahab, the lead researcher, said system visible on them. BHP, Vale cleared by court over dam disaster

RIO DE JANEIRO (AFP): A Brazilian court on Fernandes. Thursday cleared mining giants BHP and Vale, and their Brazilian joint venture Samarco, of responsibility over a 2015 dam collapse that caused the country's worst ever environmental disaster.

The dam's rupture on November 5, 2015 near the town of Mariana unleashed a giant torrent of toxic mud that swamped villages, rivers and rainforest, killing 19 people on its way to the sea. Scientists say the sludge caused "permanent" pollution on the river Doce and its coastal plain.

Brazil's government filed criminal complaint against the mining compa-nies and several of their executives over the spill. But a court in Belo Horizonte, capital of south-eastern Minas Gerais state, where the disaster occurred, ruled that state prosecutors had failed to prove that 'individual behavior contributed directly and decisively to the collapse of the dam. "And, in the context of the criminal trial, the doubt... can only resolved in favor of the accused," the judge wrote.

Pamela Emanuele Vitoria, a fiveyear-old girl who died in the tragedy, reacted with disappointment to the companies' acquittal. "Although I expected this response from the Brazilian justice system, it was still a shock to know that in the place where we live, where we come from, they (the state) cannot give us protection," she told AFP. Xi sees an opportunity

S leaders from across the world gather for two major summits in South America in the coming days, the uncertainty brought by Donald Trump's impending return to the White House is expected to loom large. Many will be grappling with what Trump's "America First" agenda will mean for the global economy and the grinding conflicts in Europe and the Middle East. China, perhaps more than most countries, will be bracing for fractious relations ahead with the United States. But for Chinese leader Xi Jinping, the upcoming gatherings provide an opportunity in the wake of Trump's election victory to advance Beijing's own objectives: driving a wedge between the US and its allies and presenting China as an alternative, stable leader.

How well Beijing makes its case at the APEC summit of 21 Asia-Pacific economies in Peru this week, followed by a meeting of the Group of 20 (G20) major economies in Brazil next week could be critical to China weathering the anticipated coming storm. In his first term, Trump unleashed a trade and tech war with China and reframed the rising power as an American rival - a path largely followed by his successor Joe Biden, who further irked Beijing by bringing US allies and partners along on his China policy. And with Trump's second term raising the threat of further heavy tariffs and uncertainty, Xi and his delegation will be carefully calibrating their diplomacy at the two meetings. President Biden Japanese Prime Minister Shigeru Ishiba and Australian Prime Minister Anthony Albanese are among the leaders also expected to attend both summits, while Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi will attend the G20.

"It makes sense for Chinese officials to use these big events to try and shape some of the international narratives right now," said Li Mingjiang, an associate professor of international relations at Singapore's Nanyang Technological University. "Since there's not much time before January 2025." Trump has proposed hitting all Chinese imports to the US with upwards of 60% tariffs and could deepen Biden-era policy constraining Beijing's access to sensitive high tech. He also appears to be looking to fill his cabinet with China hawks, asking Congressman Mike Waltz to be his national security adviser, according to CNN reporting, and Marco Rubio to join the administration as secretary of state.

Xi's congratulatory message to Trump last week appeared to show some of Beijing's concerns. The Chinese leader warned that the two countries "will both benefit from cooperation and lose from confrontation," according to China's Foreign Ministry. Xi may look to underscore that message during a final meeting with Biden that senior US officials said would take place Saturday in Lima. Beijing would use such a meeting to signal that it wants communication and stability in the relationship, observers say. But as questions loom over how tense US-China ties could become, Beijing sees good relations with a wide range of other countries - and unrestricted access to their markets - as key to protecting its economy. That's especially as it grapples with slowing growth, weak consumer demand and high unemployment at home. And in Beijing's eyes, global uncertainty about Trump creates an opening for it to chip away at what, under Biden, had been increasing coordination between the US and its allies in trade, security and other areas to counter the perceived threat from China.

Many of the leaders that worked alongside Biden will be watching warily how Trump, known for his erratic and transactional brand of diplomacy, may alter their relations when he starts his term in January. The president-elect has threatened 10% tariffs on goods imported to the US from all countries, including close partners. He's called on US allies in Asia to pay more to host American troops - and said he would encourage Russia to do "whatever the hell they want" to any NATO member country that doesn't meet spending guidelines on defense. "China wants to signal that it's not going to be very wise to completely side with the US - and to consider working with China as well," said Liu Dongshu, an assistant professor of international affairs at the City University of Hong Kong. Beijing has already taken steps to improve its relationships with America's key allies and partners in recent months, for example opening visa-free entry to China for citizens of multiple European countries and resuming a trilateral summit with Japan and South Korea.

Xi and another close US partner, Indian leader Modi, met for their first formal bilateral meeting in five years in October, after reaching an agreement on military disengagement along their contested border - a significant step to ease tensions. Earlier this month, Chinese Premier Li Qiang pledged to leaders and executives at a trade expo that China would open its market further to create "great global opportunities." Xi and his delegation are likely to continue to telegraph such messages to US partners during the summit meetings in Lima and Rio de Janeiro, while also looking to project China as a leading power that's dedicated to global stability. "For G20 and APEC, China's message will be 'There is major uncertainty ahead, but China is the certainty and will remain committed to peace and development," said Yun Sun, director of the China program at the Stimson Center think tank in Washington. Chinese leaders, however, will face an uphill struggle to win the trust of US partners across both Europe and Asia, observers say. Regardless of any frictions with the future US president those countries have watched with alarm as Xi has ramped up his aggression in the South China Sea and toward Taiwan while backing Russian leader Vladimir Putin as he wages war on Ukraine. Still, they may have no choice but to collaborate with China more, should Trump repeat decisions of his first term to retreat from organizations like the World Health Organization or international agreements like the Paris climate accord. Such moves would also bolster Xi's long-standing aim to reshape the international liberal order he sees as unfairly skewed toward the US - and pitch China as its alternative leader. His vision has so far found most support in the Global South, where China's Belt and Road Initiative and other development efforts have already expanded Beijing's

"If America is withdrawing from the global system, there is a space for someone else to step in - and China is one of the very few countries who both have some capacity and some intention to fill in that gap," said Liu in Hong Kong. China's capacity to do so, however, is linked to the strength of its economy - and how it copes with potential further pressure from the US, he added. As such, Beijing may proceed with care both in its diplomacy in the days ahead and its broader international efforts, according to Sun in Washington. "Beijing does worry about Trump's wrath and what he could do to damage China's interest on a bilateral level," she said. "China will have to balance its advancement for global leadership with considerations of relations with the US, and to avoid poking Trump in the eye.'

So far, however, the loss and damage fund is tiny compared to the cost of climate-related disasters. As of late September 2024, the total pledges were about $700 million. According to one estimate, the annual loss of life, are about 150 times that at more than $100 billion. The fund is only part of a mosaic of initiatives. The disaster management community is getting creative about helping countries finance disaster risk reduction and response. Traditionally, humanitarian funding arrives after a disaster happens, when photos and videos of the horrible costs directly attributable to event encourage governclimate change, including ments to contribute financial support and needs assesscompleted. ments are However, with today's tech-UN climate conference, nology, it's possible to forecast many climate-related disasters before they happen, and there is no reason for the humanitarian system to wait to respond until after groups and researchers I work with has been developing anticipatory action systems designed to make funding available to countries when an extreme event is forecast but before the disaster hits.

Traditional insurance, however, can be expensive and slow to assess individual claims. One solution is "index insurance" that pays out based on drought information without needing to wait to assess the actual losses. African nations created an anticipatory drought insurance product that can pay out when the drought starts happening, without waiting for the end of the season to come and crops to

This could, in theory, allow farmers to replant with a drought-resilient crop in time to avoid a failed harvest. Another promising area of innovation is the design of social services that can scale up when needed for extreme weather events. These are called climate-smart social protection systems. For example, existing programs that provide food for low-income families can be scaled up during and after a drought to ensure that people still have sufficient and nutritious food. This requires government coordination among the variety of social services offered and is a promising way to support vulnerable communities in the face of the rising number of extreme weather events.

These novel mechanisms to finance disaster risk are exciting, but they should be coupled with investments in adaptation and resilience so that extreme weather events cause less damage. Communities will need to take steps such as planting different crops, building flood drainage systems and living in adaptive buildings. Managing climate risk requires a variety of innovative solutions before, during and after disaster

Reportedly, Trump explicitly warned Putin against escalating ity or denying events that have the conflict in Ukraine, underscoring the substantial presence the Kremlin feel it necessary to of US military forces in Europe.

However, the Kremlin is using these smokescreens as distractions, so it is important not to take them at face value. The essential question remains: Why would Putin, at this point in time, genuinely be prepared to make any concessions? So far, no one has been able to provide a credible answer to that. Nevertheless, there are at least two credible reasons for Russia's feigned willingness to engage in dialogue.

The first lies in the issue of status, which Russia's long-standing leader has mentioned repeatedly in view with BBC journalist Steve Rosenberg. The Kremlin sees a dialogue on equal footing with the United States as valuable in itself. Moscow is fixated on the idea that Or is this all part of a secret, Russia should stand as an equal (or nearly equal) partner with still the only other global power, the United States, in determining the fates of the world. In this context, the actual outcomes of such discussions are ultimately secondary. For own reward. A similar path lies in gradually undermining the cohesion of the Western alliance and loosening the bonds of the transatlantic relationship as a whole. By instrumentaliz-Trump's diplomatic (or ing undiplomatic) maneuvers, Moscow is aiming to sow distrust among Western allies. Denying even the existence of a phone call casts the incoming US administration as unreliable in the eyes of the global public and, most importanty, its allies weeks before it even takes office.

The Kremlin sends out mixed signals to amplify this effect: on the one hand, indicating a willingness to engage in talks, while on the other, asserting the non-negotiabiliof its positions. Kremlin spokesperson Peskov, just days after Trump's election victory, stated that while Putin was open to discussions with Trump regarding Ukraine, Russia's war objectives would remain unchanged. Peskov emphasized that the Russian president had not once suggested that the goals of the war might be Russia, the proverbial journey is its altered. Intel agencies, already anxious over Trump NSIDE the US intelligence community, a deep wariness about a tor of national intelligence, second Trump administration has set in, stoked by memories of the antagonistic relationship the nation's spy agencies had with Donald Trump the last time he was president.

But when news broke Tuesday evening that Trump had selected as his Director Ratcliffe, the former director of national intelligence, some career officials were cautiously optimistic, seeing Ratcliffe as a largely professional and potentially less disruptive choice than some other former officials believed to have been under consideration. "As good as it was going to get," said one intelligence official.

"Relief over alternative names suggested," said another. "It could have been a lot worse," said a third intelligence official. Current and former officials also cautioned not to assume that the intelligence community is uniformly opposed to Trump. Across the 18 agencies that make up the intelligence community, including a wide swath of its thousands of analysts and operators, there are plenty who sup-port him and likely welcome his return. "The IC is not a monolith," one former senior official said.

Still, there remains simmering concern that Trump will run roughshod over bureaucratic norms and cultural traditions. Broadly, multiple career officials told CNN, a sort of fatalism has set in across the community. Analysts and other employees "know what we're in for," said one official.

"We did this before," said still another at a different agency. Some officials are worried about their jobs under a president who has vowed to "clean out" the intelligence community Others fear Trump will put America's national security at risk by doubling down on what some career officials saw as a cavalier approach to America's most closelyguarded secrets, including his decision to hoard boxes of classified documents at his Mar-a-Lago estate. And then there's just the stress of working for Trump: For a federal bureaucracy used to national security decisions made for a chaotic and unpredictable work environment. Officials famously struggled to keep his attention during briefings. It was exhausting," said one official who worked under the first Trump administration. Some federal employees may decide it's simply not worth it and quit or retire. There is "no question" that there are "plenty" of intelligence officials who "would rather there be a different POTUS to brief," said one of the officials. "We are committed to ensuring a smooth transition," said one CIA official.

Some career officials had feared that Trump would name Kash Patel as CIA director. The former Republican Hill staffer rose to prominence during the first Trump administration, and worked to declassify intelligence related to Russia that Trump believed would expose wrongdoing in the intelligence community. Patel has remained outspoken about his deep skepticism of the integrity of the IC and may yet find a role, according to one former administration official who has remained in contact with Trump's orbit.

In naming Ratcliffe, the former official said, Trump still made it clear that he remains obsessed with his grievances toward the IC, in particular the assessment that Russia interfered in the 2016 campaign in an effort to get Trump elected. "That's where I have doubt." Trump officials broadly believe that an entrenched bureaucracy of career civil servants meant to follow the policy direction set by political appointees - has grown too powerful, complaining that officials frequently stepped beyond their remit to slowroll or stymie directions from then-President Trump simply because they didn't like them during his first administration. "You have people in the way who are purposely not doing what's being asked of them or not trying to implement the president's policies because they personally disagree with it," said one former official who the first Trump administration. For some inside the intelligence community, of course, those officials were providing an important check on a president disinterested in following either norms or laws.

Memories of the tumultration remain fresh in the minds of many career officials. One senior intelligence official said some veterans in his office told "war stories" on the morning after the election.

On several occasions, Trump alarmed some career officials with how he handled classified information - not just with his decision to keep top-secret documents at his Florida estate after he left the White House. In 2017, he was accused of disclosing highly-sensitive Israeli intelligence to top Russian officials during an Oval Office session. In 2019, he tweeted a classified image of an Iranian rocket launch site taken by one of America's most exquisite satellites - a closely watching who the demonstration of the kind tration's predicate for the of capability the intelli-

But for much of the workforce, multiple current intelligence officials serving in roles ranging from mid-level to senior told CNN, the more immediate concern is their jobs. Trump has promised in his second term to "clean out all of the corrupt actors in our national security and intelligence apparatus," which he is expected to do by reclassifying a large portion of the federal civilian workforce to make it easier to fire them - an effort commonly referred to as 'Schedule F" for the new employment category he sought to create at the end worked with Patel during of his first term. "People are just really worried about them cleaning house, about people losing jobs, about Schedule F and how far that will go," said one former senior intelligence official who is still in touch with former colleagues.

That fear poses a potentuous first Trump adminis- tial risk not just to individual federal employees but also to national security, the former official and another senior US intelligence official said. If analysts start to "self-censor" for fear of angering the president and losing their job, it could lead to the kind of bad analysis, missed warnings and faulty logic that officials refer to as "intelligence failures," these people said.

The classic example is the IC's incorrect judgment after September 11, 2001, that Iraq weapons of mass destruction - now often pointed to by intelligence scholars as the natural consequence of the politicization of intelligence. That assessment became the Bush adminis-

This is why, in part, it was Starmer himself who went to the Cop29 summit in Baku this week gradually became accustomed to to announce new commitments having his feet under the to cleaner energy goals. Starmer has spent a lot of time abroad in the government's early months, largely because the diary required his attendance at a succession of international gatherings, of which next week's G20 summit in Brazil will be the next in a long line that started with the European political community summit at Blenheim Palace in

Expect, though, before Christmas, to see Starmer starting to play a much more central role on domestic policy, too. There are at least two such events in the imminent Downing Street grid now. At least one of them is likely to involve making a case for NHS reforms of the kind that the health secretary, Wes Streeting, announced this the Blairites" to Downing Street must be seen. For once, such scare stories. This time, they are simply true. The Blairites - or some of them - are indeed back. Their return does not embody a change of political direction for the Starmer government. More, it consolidates Starmer's willingness to grasp that Labour's project will not get far in the Trumpian 2020s unless it draws on experienced and politically savvy people who are willing to

The appointment of Tony Blair's former chief of staff Jonathan Powell as national security adviser from the start of December is the most eye-catching example of this. With Starmer refocusing on domestic policy, Powell is likely to carry a lot of the international heavylifting. But the return as director of policy delivery and innovation | maddeningly slow process reflects what has in the old Blair inner circle, is, if anything, more crucial. her shoulders. None of this is to claim that Starmer's in-flight rebuilding of his governmental engine is without problems, still less that it will succeed. But it should be seen for what it is: as a very large change moment that makes coherent sense of Gray's departure. Back in the summer, Starmer was still engaged in the "phoney war" early stages of his attempt to refit Labour as a plausible government for the transformed 2020s political landscape. Now he has set his course. Even now, it may all have happened too late to undo the damage that the government inflicted on itself in the early months. impending arrival at the White House is not only having a seismic impact on American politics. It is also creating dramatic changes to the global landscape, especially regarding the conduct of hostile states that will soon find themselves in the new administration's cross hairs. Russia, China, Iran and North Korea are among those that have cause to be concerned about the impact ment of John Ratcliffe, who is the more robust approach adopted by the incoming Trump administration will have on their fortunes. Even though the president-elect is still in the early stages of forming his new administration, it is already abundantly clear that Trump 2.0 will be a far more formidable beast than Trump 1.0 in terms of its approach to the world's malcon-appointment of Pete Hegseth, a high-profile military veteran and Fox News presenter, as Trump's next defence secretary will certainly concentrate a few minds in places like Moscow and Tehran. A hawk on both Russia and Iran, Hegseth has been a vocal critic of the Biden administration's half-hearted support for Ukraine, scramble to capture as much terriand previously called on Trump during his first stint in the White House to launch direct military action against the ayatollahs.

Add to this Trump's appointconvinced that Covid originated from a Chinese research laboratory, as CIA director, and Mike Waltz, another renowned China hawk, as national security advisor, and it is clear that, with the equally hawkish J?D Vance set to become president, vice Washington's foes will mess with the next Trump administration at their peril. The prospect of Trump's imminent return to the Oval Office has certainly had a galvanising impact on America's adversaries, with his election victory forcing them to have a serious rethink about their options. Nowhere is this more evident than on the Ukrainian battlefield, where Russian president Vladimir Putin has launched a desperate tory as possible, even if it means sustaining even greater casualties. There is a general expectation that one of Trump's first moves will be become secretary of state, has little the election campaign that he protect their interests. This long-could do so within 24 hours. This has prompted both Russia and Ukraine to intensify their efforts to capture as much territory as possible to create "facts on the ground" prior to any negotiations taking place. Russia's attempts to retake territory in the southern Kursk region, which was captured by Ukraine in the summer, is proving particularly costly, with the Russian military suffering an astonishing 2,000 casualties a day. With the Russians having sustained in excess of 500,000 casualties since Putin launched his "special military operation" in February 2022, Moscow has now deployed an estimated 10,000 North Koreans troops to support its operations in Kursk, a development that has its own grave implications for Western security.

With China and Iran already providing military support for Moscow's war effort, the introduction of another rogue actor to back Russia's land grab is a graphic reminder of the dramatic changes taking place to the global threat environment.

Nor is this radical change in behaviour confined Washington's foes. This week's suggestion that the European Commission is looking to change its spending policies to allow greater investment in the bloc's defence and security could prove overdue move, which could see tens of billions of euros redirected to fund Europe's defence needs, is a belated acknowledgement that, with Trump back in power, European nations can no longer rely on Washington to defend them.

The commission's overdue initiative is certainly something No?10 should take on board as the UK, in common with the rest of its European allies, is singularly illprepared to defend itself without American support.

It is not beyond the bounds of possibility, for example, that Sir Keir Starmer could soon find himself facing calls from Trump for British forces, together with other European allies, to be deployed to Ukraine to patrol a demilitarised zone on Ukraine's eastern border in the event of a ceasefire being implemented.

Given the current parlous state of our Armed Forces, with the Army being reduced to its smallest level since the Napoleonic era, the Government would struggle to meet such a request, a failing that would simply confirm Trump's long-held view that America's key allies are not serious about funding their defence commitments. Trump's imminent return to the White House may be a cause of consternation for America's foes. But it should also serve as a warning that his new administration will expect all Washington's allies to pay their fair share towards the defence of the free world.

Rozner overtakes McIlroy and Hatton

DUBAI (AFP): Antoine Rozner hit a flawless seven-under-par 65 to overtake Rory McIlroy and Tyrrell Hatton on top of the leaderboard after the second round of the World Tour Championship in Dubai on Friday. The 31-yearold Frenchman finished with four straight birdies, for a total of seven, and had no bogeys as he took a one-shot lead on McIlroy and Hatton, who both hit 69. Northern Ireland's McIlroy, bidding to equal Seve Ballesteros' mark of six European Tour Order of Merit crowns, and England's Hatton had lead overnight in the seasonending tournament. "It's one of those days where everything goes in and I had a ton of fun out there," said world number 154 Rozner, who carded 70 in the first round. "I just think the confidence clicked and everything is going the right way." With 2,000 points on offer to the winner, McIlroy only needs a top ten finish to secure a sixth Race to Dubai crown of his matching career, Ballesteros. McIlroy made a fast start with three birdies in his first four holes. Another followed at the seventh a he climbed to nine under, only to bogey the eighth and tenth to gift the lead to Rozner. McIlroy parred his way to the par-five last, where he produced a stellar second shot inside 15 feet and brushed the left edge of the cup with the eagle putt which would have seen him rejoin the lead. Hatton had to grind his way into contention after bogeying the fourth, hitting back with a birdie putt at the sixth before adding another at the eighth. The World Number 18 holed from eight feet at the tenth to pick up a shot and when he holed a clutch putt from eight feet for birdie at the 15th, he was one adrift of Rozner. Chile's oaquin Niemann carded an eagle, five birdies and two bogeys in his 67 to sit at seven under

Sri Lankan president's coalition wins in election

COLOMBO (Reuters): Sri Lankan President Anura Kumara Dissanayake's leftist coalition won a thumping victory in a snap general election, gaining power to push through his plans to fight poverty and graft in the island nation recovering from a financial meltdown.

backing from the north and east of the country which is home to the minority Tamil people, is an unprecedented vote for change and indicates that Sri Lanka is in sync on moving ahead, analysts said. While the strong showing will strengthen political stability in the South Asian country, some uncertainty on policy direction remains due to Dissanayake's promises to try and tweak terms of the Monetary Fund (IMF) rescue programme that bailed the country out of its economic

But his coalition had just three seats in parliament, prompting him to dissolve it and seek a fresh mandate in Thursday's snap election. Sri Lanka typically backs the president's party in general elections, especially if voting is held soon after a presidential vote. "The president has a huge Dissanayake's Marxistleaning National People's Power (NPP) coalition won 159 seats in the 225-member parliament, the election commission said on Friday, a massive two-thirds majority and one of the biggest in the country's history. The Sri Lanka Podujana Peramuna party of the Rajapaksa family, whose cohort of brothers gave Sri Lanka two presidents during a dozen years in power and had 145 seats in the outgoing legislature, was virtually wiped out, winning just three seats. "We see this as a critical turning point for Sri Lanka. We expect a mandate to form a strong parliament, and we are confident the people will give us this mandate," Dissanayake said after casting his vote on Thursday. There is a change in Sri Celebrations were largely muted, with the exception of a few NPP loyalists who lit fireworks on the outskirts of the capital, Colombo. The Samagi Jana Balawegaya party of opposition leader Sajith Premadasa, the main challenger to Dissanayake's coalition, won 40 seats and the New Democratic Front, backed by previous President Ranil Wickremesinghe, won just
